She turned her handkerchief down from her neck, which, with the glow that the work bad brought into her cheeks, formed an object which 1 do Dot say would have made me actual-y stap my chaise, had it not been for the occupation in which she was engaged; but, all taken together, the temptation was too strong to be resisted. But, there is the Sunday, and 1 know of no law human or divine, that forbids a labouring man to dig or plant his garden on Sunday, if the good of his family demand it; and if be cannot, without injury, to that family, find other time to do it in. Shepherds, carters, pigfeeders, drovers, coachmen, eonks, printers, and numerous others, work on the Sundays. Theirs are deemed by the law, works of necessity. Harvesting and haymaking are allowed to be carried on on the Sunday, in certain cases; when they always are carried on by provident Jarmers. And 1 should be glad to know the case which is more a case of necessity, than that now under our view. In fact, the labouring people do work on the Sunday morning in particular, all over the country, at something or other, or they are engaged in pursuits a good deal less religious than that of digging and planting. So that as to the 200 hours, they nre easily found, without the loss of aoy of the time required for constant daily labour. 134....
