One of them was Ulrike Malmendier whose first economic researches deal with managerial hubris. Introducing her is proving the importance of a new economic domain called 'behavioural economics'. As a behavioural economist Malmendier criticises the 'homo-economicus'-model and the idea of people acting entirely rational. In fact, people constantly display irrational behaviour that results out of cognitive biases (that distort their perception) and also results out of simple, but biased decision rules (heuristics) that the human mind implies. One of those cognitive biases is that people seem to be unreasonable overconfident. The study of overconfidence is originated in the psychological literature. Because of it's great impact on the behaviour of economic actors, it recently influences economic and finance literature (Benoît,...
